

Aviation Experts Share Safety Practices for Summer Traveling

With the aviation industry welcoming a record-breaking number of travelers, the industry prepares airports for thousands of passengers. Grupo EULEN in charge of ground handling operations shares some tips.

Miami, Florida (August 2, 2023)— The aviation industry is expected to be one of the busiest this year, with the number of travelers expected to surpass pre-pandemic levels. The Transportation Security Administration (TSA) has shared numbers indicating this season will be one “for the books.” Hence, aviation professionals need to ensure ground handling services and passenger support services are met so travelers have a pleasant experience. And travelers can help out as well.

“There needs to be a joint effort between the airlines, airport authorities, state governments and companies that offer aviation services like ours, to ensure these processes run well and travelers feel safe and comfortable”, said Jose F. Gonzalez-Mixco, Vice President of Aviation, North and Central America at Grupo EULEN.

The main issues that arise with this increase in the volume of passengers usually are flight delays or canceled flights, long lines at airline counters and security checks, waiting at baggage claim and parking at maximum capacity. During these busy traveling seasons, there is an increase in all staff to streamline processes and to try to avoid these situations, but passenger compliance is key to expedite the process.

“We want to ensure we deliver clients the best service since the number of people we expect traveling will increase significantly this season,” Gonzalez-Mixco added. “Clean cabins, clean airports, to airport security. We are committing all resources to ensure we do our part in passengers having a pleasant experience.”

We encourage all passengers to plan; online check-ins, arrive three hours prior to scheduled flight, familiarize yourself with all safety and packing guidelines. Be attentive of flight delays so using airline applications is crucial and be aware of weather conditions that might affect your flight.
